Through Arctic Lapland Charles John Cutcliffe Wright Hyne, 2022-01-29 Excerpt It seems customary in a book of travel to make frequent allusions to other voyagers who have journeyed over the same ground or at least the same district and to make constant references to them and give copious quotations from their works Of course we ought to have gone to the British Museum before starting on our travel and there read up all books which in the least bore upon the country which we were going to visit We omitted to do this firstly because we preferred to observe things for ourselves from our own individual standpoint unprejudiced by the way in which other people had observed them and secondly from the far more potent reason that we made our actual start in a great hurry and had little enough time for any preparations whatever However on our return to England we thought well to check the information we had garnered So we duly provided ourselves with readers tickets for that institution and went to the British Museum Library and got down every book which seemed in any way to bear upon the country we had wandered over regardless of the tongue in which it was written It was a surprise to us to learn and may we add that the surprise was not without its pleasant savour that of all the volumes in that collection not one covered the route which we took during summer through Arctic Lapland Many had gone near it from a gentleman of bygone date who wrote in Latin to Mr Paul du Chaillu who chats about the larger part of the Scandinavian Peninsula But we seemed to have stumbled across the one bit of Europe which has not been pilloried on paper at one time or another and so we here venture to take up a couple of note books which were originally made for personal gratification and amplify them into a volume of letterpress and sketches which may haply interest others
