

Footprint vs. biodiversity

Ecological footprint and biodiversity are two concepts that are often mentioned together, but they are not the same. The ecological footprint is a measure of the demand on the Earth's ecosystems by human activities. It is calculated by adding up the area of land and water required to produce the goods and services consumed by a person or a community. Biodiversity, on the other hand, is the variety of life in the world or in a particular habitat. It is measured by the number of different species of plants and animals that live in a given area.

There is a strong link between the two concepts. As the ecological footprint increases, the demand on the Earth's ecosystems increases, and this leads to a loss of biodiversity. For example, the conversion of natural habitats into agricultural land for food production is a major cause of biodiversity loss. Similarly, the overexploitation of natural resources, such as fish and timber, can also lead to a decline in biodiversity.

It is important to understand that the ecological footprint is not just a measure of the demand on the Earth's ecosystems, but it is also a measure of the impact of human activities on the environment. By reducing our ecological footprint, we can help to protect the Earth's ecosystems and the biodiversity that they support. This can be done by adopting sustainable living practices, such as reducing energy consumption, recycling, and eating a diet that is low in meat and dairy products.

FOOTPRINT VS. BIODIVERSITY

The ecological footprint is a measure of the demand on the Earth's ecosystems by human activities. It is calculated by adding up the area of land and water required to produce the goods and services consumed by a person or a community. Biodiversity, on the other hand, is the variety of life in the world or in a particular habitat. It is measured by the number of different species of plants and animals that live in a given area.

LIVING PLANET INDEX

Source: WWF

The Living Planet Index (LPI) is a measure of the change in the abundance of vertebrate species populations over time. It is calculated by comparing the population sizes of 1,400 vertebrate species in 1970 to their population sizes in 2010. The LPI shows that the average population size of vertebrate species has declined by 68% since 1970. This decline is most pronounced in aquatic species, which have declined by 81%, and in marine species, which have declined by 84%. The decline in the LPI is a clear indicator of the impact of human activities on the world's ecosystems and the biodiversity that they support.
