

Using Statement-Pie to Teach Reading and Writing Skills

CAROL SUE ENGLERT
AUDREY LICHTER

■ The process of reading and writing requires the application of organizational strategies. To understand or express ideas, writers and readers must formulate a primary topic, then link this topic to the surrounding chunks of information (Meyer, Brandt, & Bluth, 1980). In this way, readers and writers seek to establish a single topic, then elaborate upon it with related propositions, proofs, examples, and counter-examples (Hanau, 1974; 1979).

DEFINING THE PROBLEM

In many mildly handicapped children, organizational skills required for knowledge acquisition are seriously deficient. Mann, Goodman, and Wiederholt (1978) reported that learning disabled children have difficulty with the processes of learning involving abstraction, analysis, and synthesis. Similar difficulties have been noted in educable mentally retarded populations (Mercer & Snell, 1977). This may account for the general failure of learning handicapped children to differentiate major ideas from less essential supporting pieces of information. Although mildly handicapped children are not unlike their nonhandicapped peers in the recall of facts, they are unable to differentiate and recall high level information corresponding to main ideas (Hansen, 1978; Wong, 1979). As a result, mildly handicapped children often acquire a fragmented representation of the content. To these children every piece of information seems important, but the pieces fail to fit together in a meaningful way.

Focusing on the Main Idea Concept

There are several problems involved in teaching main idea concepts to mildly handicapped children. Jenkins, Stein, and Osborn (1981) suggested that textual series may either fail to demonstrate adequately the concept of main idea, or fail to provide sufficient examples to assure understanding and mastery.

Additionally, many of the main idea activities that require students to title passages or underline main idea sentences do not fully model the mature comprehension process. Skilled readers seek to strip away nonessential details in their search for the major topic. Rather than recall literal sentences or titles, the mature reader identifies an idea or topic expressed in a word or phrase which can bring all of the ideas together. Once this topic is induced, preceding and subsequent ideas are then linked to, contrasted with, or modified by this initial topic.

In contrast to this process, activities requiring children to underline individual sentences direct the learner's attention to single sentence parts without helping the learner induce an understanding of the relationship of supporting details to the main idea. In effect, children are expected to discover the interrelationship between higher-level and subordinate information through practice and feedback without ever having the process first demonstrated (Samuels, 1981).

THE STATEMENT-PIE APPROACH

Hanau (1974) recommended that outlining skills be taught to improve the organizational and comprehension skills of adolescent students. According to Hanau's schema, the reader is trained to look for two major categories of concepts. First, the reader searches for the "statement," the major idea or topic of a passage which subsumes other related concepts. Second, the reader searches for the "pie," the written "proofs, information, and examples" which support the statement. By teaching readers to differentiate and label statement-pie concepts, Hanau contends that the reading skills of adolescent readers can be improved.

Similarly, Hansen (1978) recommended that outlining and other activities requiring the differentiation of main ideas and supporting details be considered in the development of comprehension programs for mildly handicapped children.

Statement-pie techniques have not yet been applied to the instruction of handicapped children. In the following section, procedures for using statement-pie methods are discussed with respect to the teaching of reading and writing skills; and then specifically, as they were applied to the instruction of two learning disabled children.
