It seems clear that 2016 will be a key year in the virtual reality industry. Multiple consumer devices that seem to finally answer the unfulfilled promises made by virtual reality in the 1990s will come to market at that time. These include the pioneering Oculus Rift, which was purchased by social media giant Facebook in 2014 for the staggering sum of $2BN. An incredible vote of confidence in where the industry is set to go. When the Oculus Rift releases in 2016 it will be competing with products from Valve Corporation and HTC, Microsoft as well as Sony Computer Entertainment. These heavyweights are sure to be followed by many other enterprises, should the market take off as expected

Like immersive virtual reality, this provides a first-person experience. One low-cost example of a 'Through the window' virtual reality system is the 3-D architectural design planning tool Virtus WalkThrough that makes it possible to explore virtual reality on a Macintosh or IBM computer. Developed as a computer visualization tool to help plan complex high-tech filmmaking for the movie The Abyss, Virtus WalkThrough is now used as a set design and planning tool for many Hollywood movies and advertisements as well as architectural planning and educational applications.
