her client's story. What she doesn't count on is Finnley Moran. Finn plans to protest the company's expansion. Owner of an ecotourism business in rural Virginia, he makes his living showcasing the beauty of the Burns River and the endangered species that live in it. When the two adversaries come together, they are swept away in a flood of passion.

Mountain Justice Tricia Shapiro, 2010-11-05 Mountaintop removal (MTR) does exactly what it says: a mountaintop is stripped of trees, blown to bits with explosives, then pushed aside by giant equipment, all to expose a layer of coal to be mined. Hundreds of thousands of acres of ancient forested mountains have been removed this way and will never again support the biologically rich and diverse forest and stream communities that evolved there over millions of years, all to support a flawed national energy policy. Mountain Justice tells a terrific set of firsthand stories about living with MTR and offers on-the-scene and behind-the-scenes reporting of what people are doing to try to stop it. Tricia Shapiro lets the victims of mountaintop removal and their allies tell their own stories, allowing moments of quiet dignity and righteous indignation to share center stage. Includes coverage of the sharp escalation of anti-MTR civil disobedience with more than 130 arrests in West Virginia alone during the first year of the Obama administration. This is an international issue: there are campaigns against this massively damaging method of mining in the UK, India, Canada, New Zealand, Burma. The proposed destruction of a number of habitats from mountain tops to heath land to jungle is a loss for us all.
