Homeland Security and ITS, 2002 Improving Surface Transportation Security National Research Council, Division on Engineering and Physical Sciences, Transportation Research Board, Computer Science and Telecommunications Board, National Materials Advisory Board, Commission on Physical Sciences, Mathematics, and Applications, Commission on Engineering and Technical Systems, Committee on R&D Strategies to Improve Surface Transportation Security, 1999-10-12 The surface transportation system is vital to our nation s economy defense and quality of life Because threats against the system have hitherto been perceived as minor little attention has been paid to its security But the world is changing as highlighted by dramatic incidents such as the terrorist chemical attack on the Tokyo subway in 1995 As a consequence security concerns are now attracting more attention appropriately so for the threat is real and responding to it is hard Although the surface transportation system is remarkably resilient it is also open and decentralized making a security response challenging Research and development can contribute to that response in important ways Some important themes emerge from analysis of this strategy First a dual use approach in which security objectives are furthered at the same time as other transportation goals can encourage the implementation of security technologies and processes

Second modeling could be used more to develop a better understanding of the scope of the security problem Third DOT can play an important role in developing and disseminating information about best practices that use existing technologies and processes including low technology alternatives Finally security should be considered as part of a broader picture not a wholly new and different problem but one that is similar and closely connected to the transportation community s previous experience in responding to accidents natural disasters and hazardous materials
