- Wallas proposed that individuals become conscious of different stages of control of thought.
- Wallas's idea that people could "control" their thoughts aligned with ideas in the rather new discipline of psychology in his day.
 - the first stage of control of thought as preparation.
 - preparation includes the entire process of education, as well as more specific process of gathering evidence to solve a particular problem or answer a particular question.
 - Hard work and "problem attitude"
 - Wallas described incubation, his second stage of control of thought, as "voluntary absentism" from conscious work on a problem.
 - He likened incubation to a period of mental rest during which thinking continued subconsciously or on the fringes of consciousness.
 - Wallas believed incubation was mostly likely to happen when one was working on something else, during physical activities, or while relaxing completely.
 - illumination, the next stage of thinking according to Wallas, was "the appearance of a new idea as instantaneous and unexpected," or as a "flash" or a "click"
 - sudden and did not last for an appreciable length of time.
 - could not be control
 - occurred on the fringes of consciousness
 - Wallas believed that intimation—the feeling that a new thought is about to emerge—preceded illumination.
 - thinkers be aware of the state of intimation, observe their thoughts and the accompanying "state of rising consciousness," and avoid two obvious dangers: drifting into daydreaming or interruption
 - Wallas described the last stage of thinking, verification, as similar to preparation in that the thinker is once again in conscious control of thought.
- He derived his four stages—preparation, incubation, illumination, verification—from descriptions of thinking and discovery by mathematicians, scientists, poets, and chess players.
- Wallas believed that thinking was not only a matter of associations—the popular view of mind in his day—but was also affected by emotions, sensations, previous experiences, and habits.
