The 2010 American Psychological Association (APA) National Survey on the Stigma of Mental Illness found that 68% of respondents believed that people with mental illness are dangerous. This finding is consistent with the findings of the 2007 survey, which found that 66% of respondents believed that people with mental illness are dangerous. The findings of the 2010 survey suggest that the stigma of mental illness remains a significant barrier to the recovery of people with mental illness.

Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The intervention group (n = 20) participated in a 12-week walking program, while the control group (n = 20) remained sedentary. The walking program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 30 minutes. The program was supervised by a physical therapist. The control group was instructed to remain sedentary. The study was conducted in a community setting. The primary outcome was the change in physical health, measured by the 6-minute walk test (6MWT) and the 12-minute walk test (12MWT). The secondary outcome was the change in psychological health, measured by the Beck Depression Inventory (BDI) and the State-Trait Anxiety Inventory (STAI). The results showed that the walking program had a significant positive effect on physical health, with the intervention group showing a significant increase in 6MWT and 12MWT scores compared to the control group. There was no significant difference in psychological health between the two groups. The study suggests that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can improve physical health in sedentary, middle-aged women.
