HOLOGRAPHIC STRUCTURES

Different species may share physical features because they share a common ancestor. We call these features 'homologous structures'. An example of this is the forelimb of the vertebrate. The pattern of bones is very similar across...

Evolution by natural selection

Small Scale

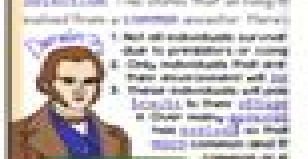

Even though small features with small changes can be evidence of evolution, it's the emergence of new species that is the real evidence of evolution. This is called speciation. It happens due to environmental selective pressures have evolved today.

Evolution by natural selection

Evolution by natural selection is a process by which organisms that are better adapted to their environment survive and reproduce. This is the basis of Darwin's theory of evolution. It states that all life has evolved from a common ancestor. There are four main points to remember:

1. Not all individuals survive due to predators or competition.
2. Only individuals that are better adapted will survive.
3. These individuals will pass on their traits to their offspring.
4. Over many generations, the population will evolve.

THE FOSSIL RECORD

What are fossils & how do we date them? Fossils are the preserved remains or traces of dead organisms. They are usually found in rocks but sometimes they are found in peat or in amber. We call all of the fossils found in the 'fossil record'. It is important to know the age of each fossil so we can work out how species evolved over time. Scientists can date fossils using the 'Layer of rock they are found in'. The oldest rocks are always found in the deepest layers - this is known as the law of superposition. They can also directly date fossils using radioactive decay of certain elements such as carbon.

How does the fossil record provide evidence of evolution? Fossils show a sequence of evolution through the gradual change of structure over time. For example, the fossil record shows the evolution of the horse from a small, three-toed animal to a large, single-toed animal.
