

6.1 Introduction

EMA3Z

Functions are mathematical building blocks for designing machines, predicting natural disasters, curing diseases, understanding world economies and for keeping aeroplanes in the air. Functions can take input from many variables, but always give the same output, unique to that function.

Functions also allow us to visualise relationships in terms of graphs, which are much easier to read and interpret than lists of numbers.

Figure 6.1: A cricket player facing a delivery. If a cricket player is hit on his batting pads and the umpire thinks that the ball would have hit the stumps behind him, he is given out LBW (leg before wicket). At professional levels of the game, sophisticated software is used to determine if the ball will hit the stumps. The software uses functions to predict the flight of the ball if the cricket players leg had not been in the way.

Some examples of functions include:

- Money as a function of time. You never have more than one amount of money at any time because you can always add everything to give one total amount. By understanding how your money changes over time, you can plan to spend your money sensibly. Businesses find it very useful to plot the graph of their money over time so that they can see when they are spending too much.
- Temperature as a function of various factors. Temperature is a very complicated function because it has so many inputs, including: the time of day, the season, the amount of clouds in the sky, the strength of the wind, where you are and many more. But the important thing is that there is only one temperature output when you measure it in a specific place.
- Location as a function of time. You can never be in two places at the same time. If you were to plot the graphs of where two people are as a function of time, the place where the lines cross means that the two people meet each other at that time. This idea is used in logistics, an area of mathematics that tries to plan where people and items are for businesses.

DEFINITION: Function

A function is a mathematical relationship between two variables, where every input variable has one output variable.

Dependent and independent variables

EMA4Z

In functions, the x -variable is known as the input or independent variable, because its value can be chosen freely. The calculated y -variable is known as the output or dependent variable, because its value depends on the chosen input value.
