Figure 4 is constructed from the graphs in the first part of the study showing the relative change in the mean $\bar{M}$ and the sample standard error $\bar{M}$. Figure 4 shows the pattern of the mean $\bar{M}$ is consistent in the forward and backward pairs of mean stress $\bar{M}$, which is in contrast with our "forward" and "backward" graphs 2. These graphs are similar to the pattern that in the data can occur independently of the shift located between the pairs if it is a pair which which starts positive independently any amount of intensity of the work, and from stress 14. The third end of the shift shows the population shift (2) through the population moving. The first relative shift for the pair (1500 $\pm$ 1.01) and for the stress (100, 1400). This may be due to the fact that the discrepancy between the existing and the desired situation is not the only factor that determines the degree of perceived stress.

The deckboard drive is controlled by the steering wheel, the components of which are interconnected through an internally mounted steering rail 1, which is fixed to the steering column 2. The position of the steering rail is independent of the input to which the drive is. The lower parts of the valve rods are located in a steering housing 3, which is fixed to the upper plate housing of the deckboard drive. The steering angle of the drive is about 30° from the steering position.

To improve the steering of the outboard drive, it is designed with an asymmetrical tilt device 2, which is operated by the steering wheel. The tilt device is fixed on the motor of the steering wheel and consists of an elastic member which operates a pull rod in the pivot point through the medium of a control pin. This rod retains the steering wheel and lifts the out drive to its tilting position. As soon as the drive has reached its fully tilting or fully down position, the elastic member acts out automatically. When being lowered, the drive automatically returns to the position of the steering wheel. The maximum tilting angle is about 30°. The outboard drive remains in the desired tilting position. This makes turning around possible with the out partly tilting for short periods at low speed.
