In constructing their dwellings, these Indians took advantage of the most plentiful building material, the grass covering the plains. A Caddo grass house is depicted above. It was framed by a series of vertical poles, bent over at the top and attached to horizontal poles or support beams which formed a dome shape. This frame was covered with an outer layer of grass tied into bundles. The bundles were overlaid and tied together much like European thatched roofs. Coarse prairie grass was used for the roof thatching and softer riverbank grass for the interior lining.
