

A woman wearing a blue headscarf and a white shirt is kneeling on a dark, textured ground, lighting small candles. The candles are arranged in a circular pattern around her, and many more are scattered across the ground, creating a warm, glowing effect. The background is dark, making the light from the candles stand out.

Decolonizing Religion and Peacebuilding Atalia Omer, 2023 An investigation of what consolidating religion as a technology of peacebuilding and development does to people's accounts of their religious and cultural traditions and why interreligious peacebuilding entrenches colonial legacies in the present Throughout the global south local and international organizations are frequent participants in peacebuilding projects that focus on interreligious dialogue Yet as Atalia Omer argues in Decolonizing Religion and Peacebuilding the effects of their efforts are often perverse reinforcing neocolonial practices and disempowering local religious actors Based on empirical research of inter and intra religious peacebuilding practices in Kenya and the Philippines Omer identifies two paradoxical findings first religious peacebuilding practices are both empowering and depoliticizing and second more doing of religion does not necessarily denote deeper or more critical religious literacy Further she shows that these religious actors generate decolonial openings regardless of how closed or open their religious communities are Hence religion's occasional usefulness in peacebuilding does not necessarily mean justice oriented outcomes The book not only uses decolonial and intersectional prisms to expose the entrenched and ongoing colonial dynamics operative in religion and the practices of peacebuilding and development in the global South but it also speaks to decolonial theory through stories of transformation and survival
