Below, participant Cheryl Lyles, with the Town of Chapel Hill, asks a question during the class.

Making government work better

In the shifting sands of partisan discord, Carolina's School of Government is a solidifying force — "a safe harbor, a neutral zone," according to its dean. And because of that impartiality, the school earns respect across the political spectrum.

Dean Michael Smith emphasizes the School of Government's connections to the legislature, policy control and regulation. "We've got here to tell you what to do," he told a room full of county officials during a recent training session in Winston-Salem. "We're here to help you think through your options."

One of the officials in the room was Swain County Commissioner Lucy Phillips, who expressed his gratitude for the services of the school.

As a reference to the commission, whose some of his colleagues had already voiced doubts, Phillips said he had a "strong learning curve" after graduation.

"And what I found out was that the School of Government prepared me to be able to hit the ground running with those guys," Phillips said. "I know how to research what a statute said. I had the contacts to pick up the phone and say, 'Hey, guys, is this right? Can we do that?' That to me is an invaluable resource for a new commissioner in North Carolina."
